Worth of Psychology For Criminals Queried

By Jim Mann Washington Post Staff Writer

Chief Judge David L. Bazelon of the U.S. Court of Appeals, the judge who pioneered in bringing psychologists and their concepts into the criminal justice field, told a group of psychologists this week that he questions their value in dealing with violent criminals.

In a speech entitled, "Psychologists in Corrections Are They Doing Good for the Offenders  $\mathbf{or}$ Well Themselves?", the judge told a meeting Thursday of about 40 correctional psychologists in Florida:

• He believes violent crime "is an inevitable by-product of our society's social and economic structure," and is not the result of sick persons who ginia that spends, and this wa must be treated by doctors.

 He does not believe more money is necessary for psychological research. When he judged research proposals on the Advisory Council of the National Institute of Mental Bazelon said, "could count on one hand" the number of research projects promising or useful for those working in criminal justice.

 He questions whether too psychologists in "action programs" such as rehabilitation.

"We now have a federal penal institution in West Vir-

JUDGE DAVID BAZELON

... unusual stance

the figure several years ago about $13,000 per year on eacl inmate", the judge said "Don't we have to ask whethe, the problem could be better handled by letting the inmate. out of the institution and jus giving each one of then $13,000 per year?"

By all accounts, Bazelon's speech provoked a strong reac tion and numerous questions much money is being spent for from the psychologists at the convention. Several psycholo gists interviewed yesterday were reluctant to discuss their feelings. They generally said that Bazelon had "oversimplithey disagreed with his remarks about money for re-

See BAZELON, C5, Col. 1

BAZELON, From C1

It was an unusual stance for Bazelon, known throughout the country as an authority on the relationship between psychology and the law. The judge is the author of the "Durham Rule," which liberalized the standards under which a defendant could be found not guilty by reason of insanity. He is also a clinical professor on the legal aspects of psychiatry at George Washingtom University Medical School.

In 1968, in a speech before the Adolescent Medicine Seminar here, Bazelon noted, "There are still many people -- tudges and others--who seem to believe that criminal behavior by white, middleclass people may well be a result of mental disorder, but that criminal behavior ghetto residents is somehow unconnected with mental illness." Ghetto youngsters, he said the, "have the highest claim to our scarce psychiatric back into the environment resources."

Over the years, in his Court vigorously fought to ensure that criminal defendants have cal examination before trial sarily agree with him. and adequate rehabilitation cial workers in a speech at need for more research.

Harvard University two or three years ago.

"Everybody thinks I'm an apologist for the behavioralfied" the problems and that ists," Bazelon said. "They don't need me to help them. They have a valuable service to perform. But they are not wizards, and we must not forget it."

In his Florida speech, Bazelon told the psychologists, "Your discipline inevitably assumes, I think, that aberrant f behavior is the product of sickness, and it brings to bear on the problem a medical or therapeutic model. That model assumes a white, middle-class, nonconforming subject whose antisocial conduct is attributable to mental disturbance."

Bazelon argued that the model does not fit for wiolent crime, much of which, he said, "is committed by persons who are clearly at the bottom of society's barrel..."

"Poor, black offenders are not necessarily sick. They may simply be responding to an environment that has impoverished them, humiliated them and embittered them.

"Will group therapy help a black teen-ager who steals cars and peddles drugs, and who will be tossed at the end of his 'rehabilitation' right that nurtured him?"

Psychologists at the conferof Appeals decisions, he has ence, which was financed by about $20,000 in federal funds, said they respected Bazelon's a full and proper psychologi-judgement but did not neces-

"He's a delightful person," once they are convicted or said Dr. Stanley Brodsky, a found not guilty by reason of psychologist at Southern Illinois University and the chair-Interviewed by telephone in man of the conference "I'm Florida yesterday, Bazelon very pleased he came and got said his speech really was not us stimulated to examine who a new position for him. He we are and what we're doing." said he had duestioned the Brodsky said he disagreed role of psychologists and so with Bazelon's views about the